SALT LAKE CITY (ABC4) — For frequent airport travelers who dread the long walk from Concourse A to Concourse B, there is a figurative light at the end of the tunnel.

Officials with the Salt Lake City International Airport announced the new “River Tunnel” will open to the public in October.

The official date for the tunnel’s opening will be Oct. 22, providing a new more direct path between Concourse A and Concourse B. The Airport posted on social media an update on the tunnel, saying installation is underway and the first of three sections is now complete.

Airport officials also confirmed moving walkways have been installed in the River Tunnel to help make the journey a little easier and faster. The new tunnel will also include space for a future train that will help take passengers to the yet-built Concourse C.

The “River Tunnel” gets its name from the art installation that will decorate the .18-mile long walk. The tunnel itself is illuminated in a cool watery blue with wavy panels overhead simulating a river.

‘The Peaks’ are Salt Lake City Airport’s new gateway welcome for visitors

It was designed by German-American artist Gordon Huether, who has had an extensive hand in the look of the new Salt Lake International Airport. Heuther has created several large-scale installations for the airport including the “The Peaks” and the resurrected Hoberman Arch outside and the “The Canyon” that lines the walls leading to the airport’s terminals on the inside.

As for the often-bemoaned mid-concourse, Airport officials said it will still be open for use even after the new River Tunnel becomes accessible.
